well I disagree because then you would have to take to test to graduate. and then you will lose a lot of time taking to test in one day or two. and it is making it more harder on the ~~teacher~~ teacher and the students. Some students will have to study for both test and some mite not pass it. because they will think about both test and that will mess your thinking up why you are on a test. and plus some people can't to test in the same day and make people want to quit the test because it is to bad on your brain. and some people do not like to write alot. and it is a lot to ~~write~~ write on a test.

This response reflects fundamental deficiencies in persuasive writing skills. The writer disagrees with making exit tests a high school graduation requirement and provides a list of key ideas to support this position (exit tests take a lot of time, make it too hard for students to pass, are confusing, and involve too much writing). However, the development of these ideas is minimal and there is no evidence of organization. Additionally, the response contains serious and persistent writing errors.
